KIM WILLIAMS: 'MMMMMMMMM EARTHWORMS!'

By Deborah Reno

MISSOULA--

You never know what Kim Williams might cook up next. One time it might be dandelion buds folded into an omelette. Another time it might be a casserole with earthworms sprinkled on top for garnish.

The Missoula naturalist and author is best known as the screechy-voiced commentator on National Public Radio's "All Things Considered," a daily news program heard only on public radio stations. She is also the author of "The Kim Williams Cookbook and Commentary," a collection of home remedies, comments from her radio program and healthful recipes, including the dandelion omelette and a "high-protein" chili made with earthworms.

National Public Radio (NPR) uses one or two of Williams' pre-recorded segments each month. In them she talks about what she calls "living in the seasons"--picking huckleberries in the Bitterroot Valley, playing in the snow, searching for the first elusive spring flower.

A second radio program, "Wednesday Morning Chat," is produced locally by KUFM radio. The format is the same as her NPR segments, except that she gets "a little more political," she said.

"All Things Considered" may be heard on KUFM at 6 p.m. daily. "Wednesday Morning Chat," a regular feature on "Montana Morning Edition," plays on KUFM at about 9:20 a.m. on Wednesdays.
